Hannah Arendt has also addressed the question of the fallibility of political power, and it is relevant to a modern problem such as the use of torture which she had in mind during her discussion of totalitarianism and totalitarian terror in Totalitarianism and Political Terror (1951) Arendt identifies the needs of the leader as characteristic of totalitarianism, as totalitarian leaders destroy the institution of family, replacing it with personal relations and the symbols of totalitarian ideology, and transforming the state into the bearer of supreme power. He shows the 'leader' as he uses the cult of the leader as a totalising force that obliterates the individual's or group's identity. Hannah Arendt, Totalitarianism and Political Terror, 1951, p.75 Arendt identifies totalitarianism's totalitarian terror as an attempt to replace the political with the total. Pertaining to this idea of totalising power is the concern of totalitarian leaders with technological developments or other resources of the modern state such as 'special service' groups or tactical units such as the Gestapo.
