Modica, Renzo : L'anarchia, la pace e la guerra (Firenze:Â .Comprehensive analysis of cytochrome P450 activity in cardiac microsomes of rat offspring exposed to maternal drinking water containing tamoxifen. Tamoxifen (TAM) is widely used in medicine and veterinary science to prevent or treat breast cancer, but it has been associated with an increased incidence of endometrial cancer. Tamoxifen metabolites have been detected in cows' milk and in the placenta of cow and rat dams. Thus, we considered TAM in utero to be a potential risk for the fetus and neonates. In order to assess the hepatic microsomal metabolism of TAM, we administered TAM (10 mg/ml) or vehicle (0.5% ethanol) to the mother rats via the drinking water during gestation and lactation. Microsomal activity was characterized by gas chromatography-mass spectrometry and high-performance liquid chromatography. Maternal treatment with TAM resulted in a 5-fold increase in the microsomal ethoxyresorufin-O-deethylase (EROD) activity toward ethoxyresorufin (EROD(6)) in the offspring, and in a 4-fold increase in the methoxyresorufin-O-deethylase (MROD) activity toward methoxyresorufin (MROD(6)), while the methoxyresorufin-O-demethylase (MROD(1)) activity was not significantly changed. No significant changes in CYP3A2 activity toward testosterone were found, but the activity of CYP2B family toward morphine was decreased by 50% in the offspring of TAM-treated mothers. CYP2C9 activity was not changed by the maternal treatment. No significant changes in CYP2C11 activity or in the activity of CYP2E1 toward para-nitrophenol or diazepam were detected in the offspring microsomes. In conclusion, these data showed that prolonged maternal TAM treatment resulted in an increase
